3. Symposium

[November 1st, 13:00-17:00]

3-1. Theme

- Grand challenges in 75rd and 76th Annual meetings
Ensuring Food Access for All: Emerging Challenges in Regional Agriculture and Forestry Research
- The Theme in 75th Annual meetings
Does Everyone Have Access to Food ? ; Emerging Challenges in Regional Agriculture and Forestry Research

3-2. Concept

As a unified theme for both the 75th and 76th Annual Meetings, we focus on the fundamental role of the food system: ensuring that food reaches the people. The revised Basic Law on Food, Agriculture and Rural Areas states that food security means "a stable supply of quality food at reasonable prices, accessible to every citizen." This year's symposium will highlight the latter part of that definition—ensuring access for every individual. We will examine current issues at the downstream end of the food chain and consumers and share challenges to be addressed.

3-2. Speakers

The President's address:

President of ARAFE, TAKETOSHI Kazuki (Ryukoku Univ.)

Chairperson:

KIYOHARA Akiko (Fukuyama City Univ.)

Presentation 1:

Food Access, Dietary Conditions, and Inequality in Urban Areas

4-6. For the application of Excellent Presentation Prize, Please check Appendix 2. There are any conditions for entry to this prize.

5. International Symposium

[November 2nd, 10:00-12:30]

2025 International Symposium of the Association for Regional Agricultural and Forestry Economics Sponsored by the Japanese Society of Organic Agriculture Science

5-1. Theme

- Financialization of the Food System:
Contextualization in Japan and Developing a Research Agenda

5-2. Concept

The financialization of food systems has become a defining force reshaping global agricultural production, distribution, and consumption. Beyond the broad notion of financial actors gaining influence in commodity markets, food system financialization refers to the transformation of food into a financial asset, where speculation, rent-seeking, and financial engineering shape prices, market structures, and food security outcomes. This process manifests in several ways, including speculative trading in agricultural futures and derivatives, the increasing role of institutional investors and private equity in farmland and agribusiness, and the financial restructuring of major commodity traders.

The consequences of food financialization are far-reaching. They include heightened price volatility, opaque supply chain governance, market concentration in the hands of a few multinational traders, and growing disconnections between producers and consumers. These dynamics exacerbate food insecurity, marginalize small-scale farmers, and shift the priorities of food systems away from public goods and sustainability toward financial returns. While these issues have been extensively studied in North American and European contexts, their manifestations and impacts in Japan remain underexplored.

Notably, Japan has a unique historical relationship with food financialization, having pioneered one of the world's first formalized agricultural futures markets with the Dojima Rice Exchange in Osaka during the 18th century. However, contemporary financialization in Japan's food sector has received little scholarly attention, despite its significance in shaping domestic and international agricultural markets. Japan's role as a major importer, its evolving agrarian policies, and the financial strategies of its food corporations provide rich ground for analysis.

This symposium brings together international and Japanese scholars to critically engage with the evolving landscape of food system financialization. Key themes include: Speculation and Price Volatility (financial instruments), Market Concentration and Corporate Power, Financialization of Land and Production, and Regulation, Policy, and Alternative Models.

By situating Japan within global debates on food financialization, this symposium aims to advance theoretical frameworks, generate new empirical insights, and foster dialogue on policy alternatives. In doing so, it seeks to contribute to both academic discourse and practical responses to the challenges posed by financialization in food systems.
